"How would you like the regular dinner, sir? It's ver; nice this evening."
"Why, yes; we might try this." Warten was scanning the card.
"A cocktail first, sir?" taking out
his pad to write down the order.
"Two dry Martinis, and have them liv." THE place was crowded. People were waiting in the hall and

"Yes, sir. Grape frult, little neck clams or blue points?"

Warren gave the order as far down is the roast, and as the head walter curried off he glanced after him, plainty trying to place him.

"Wish I could remember where that ellow waited on me. It may have been at some club. I am sure he knows ne."

ing to us now?" exclaimed Helen.
"Look, doesn't he mean us?"
Warren, who had turned toward the door, paused and glanced back. The head waiter was plainly making his way toward them.
"Table for two? Yes, sir, just this "way." We'll get good service at this dinner "We'll get good service at this dinner all right. He's going to look out for us, that's plain. And that means a whole lot at a place like this."

And they did get good service. The head waiter has evidently instructed their waiter has evidently instructed their waiter to serve them promptly, for although they had taken their seats long after a couple at an adjoining table, they were having their soup while the other couple were still waiting for their systems.

Thinks It's a Fine Place. "Table for two? Yes, sir, just this way."

He led them to a small table, one of the most desirable in the room.

"Why, dear, this is wonderful," whispered Holen, as the head waiter moved away. "There were a lot of people waiting before us. How did he nappen to give us this table?"

Warren is Flattered.

"Think that waiter knows me. Must have waited on me somewhere, but I can't just piace him."

"Oh, then, that explains it," con-

Thinks it's a Pine Place.

"Not a bad place," commented Warren, as he looked around. "We must come here offen—on some of Maggie's evenings off. They've redecorated, too—color scheme is good, and those are epensive chandellers. Guess they must be doing a pretty good business here."

Helen remembered that they had dined here last year, and Warren had found fault with everything. Nothing had been right; he had complained of the food, the service—everything. But then there had been another head waiter and he had received no special consideration. She could not help but think what a difference a little extra attention made.

"Everything all right sir" Thinks It's a Pine Pince.

Before he passed on, he filled up their water glasses, a needless attention for they were already nearly full.
"Funny I can't place that man," frowned Warren. "Think he must

Country club. They had some mighty good walters there."

Warren's Vanity.

Helen said no more, and made a prelense at eating the squab. It was unquestionably a little strong. To her the whole dinner had seemed exceptionally poor yet Warren had not made a single criticism. The marked deference of the head waiter and the fact that they had been singled out for such special attention, had so appealed to his vanity, that he had carefully refrained
from commenting on the food.

"More butter, sir" and the waiter,
who had been hovering alert in the background, quickly brought a fresh square of butter embedded in cracked ice.

When the last course had been served, and they were sipping their coffee, the head waiter came up once more. WASHINGTON preacher is greatly concerned over the future of the American woman, because he thinks that she is to become a husky Amazon, who will have no charms for Warren stared. "For luncheon" he repeated in a puzzled tone.
"Why, yes, sir." looking at him curiously. "Aren't you the gentleman who reserves a table here every day with Mr. Forbes?" man. He says

"American women insist on playing tennis, riding, running, walking and swimming. These things are glving them undue physical development. They are going to have chests that will stand out like a college athlete's, and their necks will no longer be graceful and pretty, but thick and full of hard muscles. They will be healthy specimens, but where will their tender womanly grace be? They will be robbed of the soft, feminibe beauty that appeals to reserves a table here every day with Mr. Forbes?"

Warren shook his head. "You're mistaken there. I don't remember ever being here for luncheon."

"Oh. I beg your pardon. sir," and the head waiter hastily retreated.

Helen fumbled nervously with her napkin, avoiding Warren's glance. So all this attention and extra courtesy that had flattered Warren and impressed her, had been due only to the fact that he resembled a man who had come there regularly for luncheon.

"Let's get out where we can get some air!" snapped Warren. "The snoke in here is thick enough to cut. They ought to have some way to ventilate a place like this."

And Helen, who for once saw the humor of the situation, had to bite her lips into steadiness.

Suits IIIm to a T.

No matter how much women have varied in different countries, ages, and conditions, the men of those different countries, ages and conditions thought the women just exactly right, and were suited by them to a T. For instance, in the Orient, where the women run to fat, a feather bed figure is the ideal feminine pulchritude and the plumper a woman is the mere she is admired. In our country, on the contrary, the telephone post is the accepted standard of beauty in womanly architecture, and our men vie with each other in showerings attentions upon the maidens who hear the closest resemblance to the living skeleton. THE CALIFORNIA DISTRICT LOCATED NEAR COLUMBES Columbus, N. M., Dec. 24.—There has been started a new district, nine miles north of Columbus, which will be called the California district. The residents are all from California.

For instance, in the Lydia Languish
days, it was considered the proper thing
for a girl to be very delicate and fragile and for her to swoon away whenever anything unexpected happened.
Can you imagine a man of today falling in love with that kind of a woman?
You cannot. Nobody can. The girl that attracts him is not the feeble creature who has to lean on somebody's arm in order to walk a quarter of a mile. It is the athletic maiden who can tramp
across country half a day and be fresh
as a daisy at the end.

Nor would a swoon, however artistically pulled of, make a hit with a modern young man. "Weak heart, high altitude. Not for muh!" is the way he would diagnose the case.

His Romantic Ideal. In other days it was esteemed gross for a woman to admit to having such a thing as an appetite concealed about her person, and it was thought that it would shatter a man's romantic idea of her if he saw her partake of a square her if he saw her partake of a square meal. But fancy a man now with a wife who wouldn't eat with him! Why, he'd call in the alientists to examine her mind before the day was over. Nor would any young man nowadays be irresistibly drawn to a girl who didn't take the proper interest in food and good cooking. He'd surmise that she would be a little short in the house-keeping line.
